DE LA MOTTE CASTLE, NOSZVAJ

The castle was built between 1774 - 78 in late Baroque style. The builder was Baron Samuel Szepessy, who was a landowner from Noszvaj. Samuel Szepessy was indebted and needed to sell the castle to Anna Vécsey. Anna Vécsey, widow of Antal Almassy, was now married to Antoine de la Motte, a French colonel. The final completion and decoration of the castle is linked to their name, but on the stone pillars of the iron main gate you can still see the coat of arms of the Almassy family, the unicorn. The castle belonged to the Almassy heirs until 1869. Then István Steinhauser bought it, who later gave it as a wedding gift to his daughter Berta and his future husband Gyula Gallasy. They lived in the castle until their Berta manor or Gallasy Castle (the area of today's Oxigén Hotel), was completed in 1902. After World War II, some of the castle's goods were taken away, and the building was used by the local farm. In 1956, the National Confederation of Artisans (NCA) got a hold of the castle and the goal was to create a holiday resort. They made alterations and had the walls and frescoes repaired. In 1972, Heves County Council took over the building. At this time, another renovation took place and the frescoes were restored more professionally. Next to the castle, an educational institute was built, which became the current Tündérvilla Hotel.

The castle is a small work of art of late Baroque architecture. This style is basically characterized by symmetry and illusion-inducing. The narrowing staircase leading up from the front garden shows the main building to be larger. The builders wanted to create the same illusion by not putting the outbuildings, where the maids lived, in parallel with the main building.

The entrance hall

Entering the castle, we enter a rectangular lobby with a wagon-vaulted roof. With its green and leafy bower-like look, the outdoor natural environment and the indoor world are in a transition. The inclusion of the natural environment is also one of the common features of late Baroque architecture. On the side walls we can see blurred pictures of two buildings. On these, we can see the Schönbrunn Palace and the Palace of Versailles, which represent the nostalgia of Count de la Motte, who has often visited those places. The door and window frames are made of oak and have been preserved with the original Baroque locks.

The staircase

There is an imperial staircase from the ground-floor lobby up to the first floor. The symmetrical staircase symbolizes the royal magnificence, which emphasizes the light of the castle. The function of the stairs was to amaze the guests.

Upstairs lobby

When we get to the upstairs lobby, we can feel the symmetry again. Due to the lie of the land, the castle was built with a two-storey street front, while the western vault from the park is one storey. Here are three buildings around a small Baroque courtyard, from which it was possible to visit the English park. The bedrooms and living quarters could be in the two wings around the building's courtyard. Today the other two suites are located behind them, which are used for weddings and press conferences. In the north wing a bathroom can be found. Here, the windows open up another space through natural light. The iron lamp-standards (fancy column candlesticks) and the sky painted on the ceiling further expand the optical height. On the ceiling fresco you can see the ancient goddess of dawn, Aurora's Triumph, which is the work of the famous Baroque painter János Lukács Kracker. On the wagon we can see Apollo, the Sun God, as he rides through the sky on his ornate chariot from morning to evening. Their representation is a common theme of Baroque ceiling frescoes in castles. The most famous Hungarian example is in the hall of the Eszterházy Castle in Fertőd. The work evokes the dynamism of the Baroque style, but the depiction of the muses is a Classical feature. On the sidewalls you can see the works of József Zach, which are roman deities forced into architectural forms. The images are contemporary French caricatures for the request of Count de la Motte. The caricatures portray a camp-follower (war traveller who sold basic food and belongings to soldiers following them to the camps), a shepherd girl, a grenadier with her husband and a shepherd.

Banquet Hall

The upstairs banquet hall can be reached from the lobby. This was the largest salon in the castle. The lavishly decorated, centrally designed hall was used for festive events. There dance parties, small concerts and performances were thrown. During the Almássy period Róza Déryné Széppataki (one of the famous actresses of that time) also performed here. We can see the work of György Szikora, painter from Eger, which is on the turtle vault on the ceiling, the main theme is the wine and the enjoyment of it. Bacchus, the god of wine, ladies with wine glasses and grapes, putti turning over amphoras appear on the fresco. The sky-painted ceiling expands the headroom. Putti pointing to the hanging point of the chandelier are drawing attention to themselves as a way of keeping the light fixture. On the side walls, in painted booths we can see József Zach's works: four rococo vases with ornate flower garlands and bouquets. They show the space to be larger than the real spaciousness. The pleasant colors emit cheerfulness and bring in the outside world. The pictures are beautifully decorated with the original cylindrical stove, presumably designed by Károly Mágner, a pottery master from Győr. A defining visual element is the vibrant board parquet flooring, the exacting doors and windows.

Roman Room

The room to the left of the banquet hall is the so-called Roman room. On the ceiling the mythological topic continues. We can see Pan playing with a goat. The room was named after the roman military badges and emperor portraits visible on the side walls and the window recesses. It is worth observing the empire stove in the corner, which is also an original piece. The salon's furniture is from the County Hall of Eger.

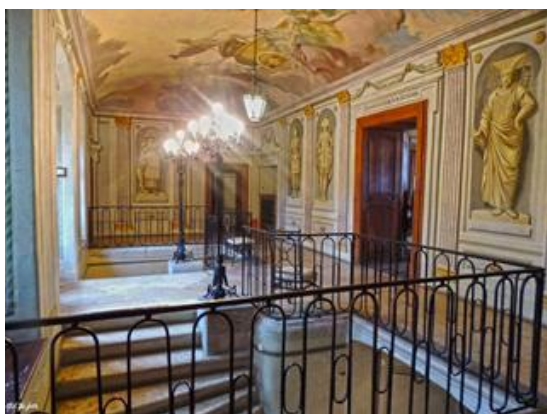

Bird Room

The Bird Room is a real gem of the castle. This is where the ladies went out for tea and talk. Different images of exotic birds can be seen on the walls, in window recesses, depicting the new world. These are the works of Antal Lieb, from the 18th century, based on French engravings. It is worth observing the original iron chandelier and the marble front-paneled fireplace, which was heated with hot air from behind. The painting above the fireplace has a different style, already made during the Almássy period. Maybe a mirror was in its place before.

Hunting Hall

The Hunting Hall and its small salon were the men's living room residence. The walls were originally white, decorated with trophies and weapons. The door from here used to lead to the living rooms. There is currently a travelling exhibition to visit with the name 'Ők is voltak gyerekek' (They were also children). The small room in the south corner is the Bird Room's pair. Here you can also find the original chandelier and fireplace. This is where the original furniture of the castle is located: a small chess table that can be converted into a card table. Besides hunting, these were the main entertainments of the lords. The castle also has a 9.5 hectare park, of which 3-3.5 hectares are a protected English park.
